EXPRESS PROBLEM BECOMING ACUTE

Causes More Transportation Worry Than Does Matter of Handling Passengers.

Railway men are not as much concerned about handling passengers as they are about the express business that at this season is the heaviest of the year. The Christmas rush of express business has already set in and with the limited train service the express stations and express depots are already beginning to be congested.

It was stated at the local express office Wednesday that it was proposed to add enough extra express cars to the trains to handle the business with very little impairment of service. For instance, on one train now handling one express car, three cars are to be used, and likewise the equipment will be increased on other runs where required.

However, officials of the express company do not hesitate to say that persons wishing to have Christmas express packages delivered on time this year should be more particular than ever about getting them started early, packed securely and marked plainly.

Taking off one-third the passenger train mileage was not reflected Monday in the number of people traveling, although there were indications Tuesday morning that some falling off in passenger traffic might be expected.

The railroads are handling the travel, however, in a fairly satisfactory way. In some instances the traffic is being routed differently and the time en route to some points is much longer, but a way has been found to accommodate all who insist upon traveling at this time. The public naturally expects some inconveniences under the present circumstances, one railway official said, and is making the best of the situation with very good grace.

HEMPEL CONCERT IS BIG MUSICAL EVENT

There appears to be one word that instinctively comes to the critic's mind when he writes a review of a concert by Frieda Hempel, who will be the Beethoven club artist attraction Thursday evening, Dec. 11, at Gleditsyn institute, H. B. Krebber, of the New York Tribune, has used it many times; W. J. Henderson, most judicious of critics, also penned it when writing of the famous soprano, as well as many others. The word that all seem to feel is the most fitting in "recruits" and it is difficult to discover one note of Miss Hempel's operatic or concert work that does not contain the expression. No other word quite expresses the complete finish and superb beauty of her art. No soprano since the days of Melba and Sembrich has received such lavish praise.

Mr. Krebber said in his review of Miss Hempel's latest New York recital that she alone of present day singers appeared destined to perpetuate the magnificent art for so many years exhibited by Mme Sembrich without a rival.

The operatic stage knows few sopranos in history of greater and more varied gifts than she. But Miss Hempel's superb work in opera has been duplicated on the concert platform as well, unusual as it is delightful. It was four years ago that she first attracted wide attention as a concert star in this country. Among the first big music festivals where she rose supremely above everything were those at Ann Arbor, Mich.; Evanston, Ill.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Richmond, Va.; and Madison, Wis. In every instance the perfect beauty of voice captivated the crowds and her personal loveliness won immediate favor. In Cleveland, the Press stated, "Such exquisite tonal quality and vocal control of perfection can be compared only to Sembrich in her prime." "Her program was faultless," said the Detroit Journal, "and she revealed song utterances so natural, so pure and spontaneous that no other voice seems quite so marvelous."

She will have as her accompanist, Conrad K. Bos, the famous Dutch pianist, who came over in September to join the noted prima donna. As an accompanist to the voice he is said to have no equal.

Miss Hempel has in her concert company a full set of great voices, A. Radach, formerly first flutist of the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra and of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, Mr. Radach will accompany her in some of her great operatic numbers, and will also play a solo group.
